Can anyone tell me what does following do? `function (arg_num) { $arg_num = $arg_num+1; $arg_str[] = "Name of argument $arg_num"; return ($arg_str); }` A: It's a multi-statement version of the following: `function($arg_num) { $arg_num = $arg_num+1; $arg_str[] = "Name of argument $arg_num"; }` And the function returns `$arg_str`. It loops from 0 to something (I suspect it's something) and builds an array. It then return the array. A: It does something like this: `function(0) { $arg_num = $arg_num+1; $arg_str[] = "nameofargument$arg_num"; return $arg_str; }` Like add an argument with the current number, then build an array and return it. A: I don't think that's valid PHP. `(arg_num)` doesn't mean "a function that takes `$arg_num` parameters". It means "a function that takes a parameter with the name '`$arg_num`'". And as you can see, it is not valid to take a parameter called '`$arg_num`'... Q: How to tell how many milliseconds have passed since Epoch for a datetime in Go I need to use an extremely low-latency function in my program (200 microseconds or less) that takes a time stamp and returns a number (all I need is the difference between two timest
